Background:

Registration of sex offenders. Sex offenders must register with their local sheriff within 24 hours after their release from confinement.

The registration requirement applies to any person who commits a sex offense. Although the registration statutes are not part of the Sentencing Reform Act (SRA), they use the SRA's definition of "sex offense." The SRA defines a sex offense as including both completed offenses and at least some attempted offenses.

As to completed crimes, the definition is clear that "sex offense" only applies to felonies. The definition is not clear, however, whether the attempts also have to be felonies. Some trial court judges have held that non-felony attempts can qualify as sex offenses under current law, while others have held they do not.

This difference in interpretation comes into play when a person has been convicted of attempting to commit a class C felony sex offense. An attempt to commit that offense is itself only a gross misdemeanor.

A concern exists that the registration requirements should apply to offenders who are convicted of attempting to commit a felony sex offense even when the attempt is not itself a felony.

Duration of registration requirement. The seriousness of the sex offense determines how long the sex offender must remain registered. The registration requirement ends for class C felonies after 10 years and for class B felonies after 15 years. For class A felonies there is no automatic ending date. Any sex offender can be relieved from the registration requirement by proving to a judge that the offender's registration no longer meets the statutory purposes.

Other uses of "sex offense" in the SRA. The SRA uses the definition of "sex offense" for a number of purposes. For example, whether or not an offense is a sex offense changes how that offense is scored for purposes of criminal history. Being convicted of a sex offense can also disqualify a person from a number of sentencing options.

Summary of Bill: The bill creates a separate definition of "sex offense" for purposes of registration and clarifies the definition that applies for other purposes under the SRA.

Registration of sex offenders. For purposes of registration, the definition of "sex offense" is changed to include convictions for attempting to commit felony sex offenses, even if the attempt itself is not a felony. Accordingly, a person convicted of attempting to commit a class C felony sex offense must register as a sex offender.

Duration of registration requirement. For those non-felony attempts that qualify as sex offenses, the registration requirement automatically ends after 10 years. These offenders are eligible to petition the court to be released from this requirement.

Other uses of "sex offense" in the SRA. For all other purposes under the SRA, the definition of "sex offense" is clarified to unambiguously apply only to offenses that are themselves felonies. Accordingly, a person convicted of an attempt that is not itself a felony has not committed a sex offense for the SRA's sentencing purposes.

Appropriation: None.

Fiscal Note: Available.

Effective Date: Ninety days after adjournment of session in which bill is passed.

Testimony For: This bill closes a loophole for attempted class C felony sex offenses. The bill will apply only in a handful of cases. It will help protect the public. The definition of "sex offense" should not necessarily be the same for purposes of sex offender registration as for purposes of the Sentencing Reform Act. The Sentencing Reform Act applies only to felonies, but there is no reason why the registration statutes should be limited only to felonies. A person who attempts a sex offense is just as much a threat to the community as is a person who completes the offense.

Testimony Against: None.
