Background: Prior to the enactment of legislation in 1994, cities and towns were classified into first class cities, second class cities, third class cities, towns, unclassified cities, and code cities. At that time, no second class cities existed. Legislation was enacted in 1994 changing third class cities into second class cities, repealing many prior second class city statutes, and recodifying third class city statutes into the chapter of law containing second class city statutes.

The original provisions of the state constitution allowed a city with a population of 20,000 or more to adopt a city charter. However, Amendment 40 to the state constitution was approved by state voters in 1964 reducing the minimum population for a city to adopt a charter from 20,000 to 10,000. Statutes classify cities that have adopted a charter under the constitution as first class cities, but one statute still refers to a city with a population of 20,000 or more being authorized to adopt such a charter.

Prior to the enactment of legislation in 1994, the terms of offices of city commissioners were not staggered and three commissioners were elected once every four years in an odd-numbered year to four-year terms of office. However, legislation was enacted in 1994 staggering the terms of office for city commissioners and providing for election once every two years when either one or two commissioners are elected to four-year terms of office.

Legislation was enacted in 1907 authorizing metropolitan park districts to be created in first class cities. In 1967, legislation was enacted authorizing code cities and allowing a code city with a population of 10,000 or more to adopt a charter and become a charter code city. A code city statute essentially amends metropolitan park district statutes by inference and allows a metropolitan park district to be created in a charter code city. Legislation was enacted in 1985 allowing a metropolitan park district to be created in any city with a population of 5,000, but the separate charter code city statute relating to metropolitan park districts was not repealed to take note of this change.

Summary of Bill: A variety of statutes are amended to correct city classifications.

Various statutes are amended changing references to third class cities to second class cities. A reference is stricken in second class city statutes to remove an inference that cities with a commission form of government do not hold municipal elections every odd-numbered year. An unused code city statute is repealed authorizing a metropolitan park district to be created in a charter code city.
