Background: School districts must provide instructional programs to a wide variety of children with very different learning needs. School districts may have difficulty in providing services to this wide range of students; for instance, students who are academically at-risk or who have had discipline problems. Alternative educational services are available, including alternative learning programs within school districts, vocational skill centers, education centers for drop-outs, and other public and private educational programs outside of a school district.

Alternative Education Programs

School districts may provide alternative learning experiences for students that count toward a course of study. If the school district provides an alternative learning experience, the school district must adopt a written plan that describes how student performance will be supervised, evaluated, and recorded by school district staff. School districts may contract with an agency to provide courses if a school district adopts a resolution that it is in the best interest of the students to expand the options available to students. If the school district contracts with an agency, several conditions must be met, including complying with applicable laws, satisfying funding, staffing, and enrollment requirements, and ensuring that a contract is established and monitored.

Skills Centers

Skills centers are run by eight interdistrict cooperatives. The eight skills centers are: Sno-Isle; Spokane; New Market; Yakima; Tri-Tech; Clark County; Kitsap Peninsula; and Sea-Tac. Each of the eight skills centers functions as a multi-district cooperative and acts as an extension of local high schools at off-site locations. Skills centers offer classes that are three periods long and are taught by a vocationally certified instructor. According to the Legislative Evaluation and Accountability Program Committee (1995), skills centers generally offer higher-cost programs, enroll more high-risk students, use more contractual services for instruction, and provide more hands-on learning than comprehensive high school programs.

Education Centers

The Legislature created education centers for public school drop-outs. Education centers operate on a client-centered basis, with specific attention given to diagnosing the student's learning needs and improving the student's motivation and academic performance. Certified teachers must provide instruction. Students may take the general educational development (GED) test or reenter public school if they demonstrate satisfactory performance. Students must have dropped out of school for 30 days prior to applying, or be referred to an education center by a public school official prior to being out of school 30 days. Students who have been expelled or suspended may enroll in education centers.

Other Schools

School districts may accept applications from nonresident students. School districts must establish policies for admitting nonresident students and for allowing intradistrict transfers.

Summary of Bill: The Legislature finds that school districts may have difficulty in providing instruction to students who are academically at risk, or who have been subject to disciplinary action due to behavioral problems. The Legislature intends to expand the educational options for these students. A list of entities with whom a school district can contract is added to statute. The list contains:
