Background:

Under the Washington statutes, court rules and constitution, judges pro tempore may be appointed to temporarily serve in the courts for various reasons, such as in the absence of a regular judge or to deal with excessive caseloads.

Washington voters amended Article IV, Section 7, of the Washington Constitution during the 2001 general election. The constitution was amended to allow the appointment of a judge pro tempore to hear a case in superior court either: (1) if the parties consent and the judge pro tempore is a member of the bar; or (2) without the consent of the parties if the appointment is made pursuant to the supreme court rule. The amendment required the supreme court rule to consider the experience of the judge pro tempore before making an assignment.

On December 6, 2001, the Washington Supreme Court adopted Order 1001-50. The order provides that presiding judges will make pro tempore assignments based on the experience and demonstrated ability of the elected judge pro tempore with the subject matter and level of complexity of the case. Further, each court may appoint a minimum of three but no more than 15 elected judges pro tempore.

Under the court rule, any party or attorney appearing in any case before an elected judge pro tempore is entitled to one notice of change of judge in addition to an affidavit of prejudice. The counsel in the case must file a "Notice of Change of Judge" before the judge has made any discretionary ruling in the case.

A retired judge can still act as a pro tempore judge without the consent from the parties if a previously elected judge of the superior court retires while a case is pending. According to case law, previously-elected, retired judges include judges who have lost a re-election.

The judge pro tempore's actions in the case have the same effect as if he or she were a judge of the court.

Summary of Bill:

A case in superior court may be tried by a judge pro tempore without the consent of the parties in the suit, if the judge pro tempore is a sitting elected judge. The appointment of a judge pro tempore must be made pursuant to supreme court rules.
