Background:

State laws define a number of criteria for determining residency for purposes of paying resident tuition rates at public institutions of higher education. The primary criterion is that the student, or his or her family if the student is a dependent, must have a bona fide domicile in Washington for at least one year prior to the academic year in which the student wishes to enroll.

Native American students can qualify for resident tuition if they were a resident of Idaho, Montana, Oregon, or Washington during the prior year, and if they are a member of an American Indian tribe whose traditional and customary tribal boundaries included portions of Washington, or whose tribe was granted reserved lands in the state. Thirty-three different tribes are specified in the statute. Twenty-seven are Washington State tribes recognized by the federal government. Five are tribes whose primary tribal boundaries are in neighboring states.

If a Native American student would not otherwise qualify as a resident, but does qualify under this law, the institution cannot count that student as a "state-supported" student for purposes of budgeted enrollment, and no state funds are provided to support that student's education.

This law was enacted in 1994. Since that time, two additional Washington tribes have received federal recognition: the Samish Indian Nation and the Cowlitz Tribe. These tribes are not currently included in the statutory list of tribes under the law regarding resident tuition for Native American students.
