Background:

District court population estimates were previously used to determine the number of judges per district court, and to determine the salaries of part-time judges. Currently, the Supreme Court determines the number of district court judges. The Washington Citizen's Commission of Salaries sets judges' salaries.

Population is defined as the latest population of each county as estimated and certified by the Office of Financial Management (OFM). Every four years, the OFM is required to estimate and certify to the county legislative authority the population of each judicial district of each county.

Summary of Bill:

The requirement that the OFM estimate and certify to the county legislative authority the population of each judicial district is removed.

Appropriation: None.

Fiscal Note: Available.
