House Committee on Judiciary

Background: A criminal defendant is incompetent to stand trial if the defendant does not have the capacity to understand the proceedings or sufficient ability to assist in their own defense. When a court finds that a defendant is incompetent to stand trial, the defendant may not be placed on trial unless and until competency is restored. If the defendant remains incompetent after the conclusion of any competency restoration treatment for which the defendant is eligible, the court must dismiss the charges without prejudice and may order the defendant to be transferred to a state hospital or an evaluation and treatment facility for a civil commitment evaluation.

A person is eligible for civil commitment when, as the result of a mental disorder, the person presents a likelihood of serious harm or is gravely disabled. When a person is evaluated for civil commitment following dismissal of a felony based on incompetent to stand trial, the person may also be eligible for civil commitment if it is proven that the person has committed acts constituting a felony and, as a result of a mental disorder, presents a substantial likelihood of repeating similar acts. Because the standards for incompetent to stand trial and civil commitment are different, an evaluation for civil commitment following dismissal based on incompetent to stand trial sometimes results in a determination that the person does not meet civil commitment criteria. In that case, the facility releases the person without filing a civil commitment petition. If the previous charge was a misdemeanor, the evaluator must forward the recommendation for release without a petition for civil commitment to the superior court of the county in which the criminal charge was dismissed for review.

Summary: A mental health facility that determines to release a person instead of filing a civil commitment petition for a person referred to the mental health facility for a civil commitment evaluation following dismissal of criminal charges based on incompetent to stand trial must provide written notice to the prosecuting attorney and defense attorney
