Background: DFW Authority. DFW manages and protects the state's fish and wildlife resources. DFW also monitors wildlife that cause property damage or threaten human safety.

DOT Authority. Statute requires DOT to create a statewide transportation plan with public input, and coordinate state and federal transportation policy and funding implementation. DOT also tracks elk-motor vehicle collisions in the state and installs wildlife warning signs in high crossing areas.

Crop Reimbursement for Wildlife Damage. Current law provides a method for reimbursing the public for damage caused to crops or other property by state wildlife. Citizens may seek $500 to $10,000 in reimbursement for property damage caused by wildlife.

Deer and Elk Collision Impacts. Deer and elk collisions result in an average of 1190 human injuries and two fatalities per year in the state. The highest number of elk-vehicle collisions in Eastern Washington is on Interstate 90 near Easton and Cle Elum in Kittitas County.

The Colockum Herd Plan. DFW manages the Colockum Elk Herd, under the 2006 Washington State Herd Management Plan (Plan). The overarching goals of the Plan are to manage the herd: (1) to preserve and protect elk and their habitats; (2) for a variety of recreational, educational, and aesthetic purposes including hunting, scientific study, cultural and ceremonial uses by Native Americans, wildlife viewing, and photography; and (3) for a sustainable yield.

Another goal of the Plan is to keep the population within 5 percent of 4500 elk. The Colockum Elk Herd, which roams in Kittitas and Chelan counties, grew from about 3300 elk in 2007 to over 5700 elk in 2013.

Over the past two years, the elk herd's population declined. In 2015, there were about 6100 elk in the Colockum Herd, about 5100 elk in 2016, and approximately 4500 elk or less currently.

Summary of Amended Bill: DFW and DOT must conduct an elk management pilot program for the Colockum Elk Herd in Central Washington. The pilot program must include:

- additional special depredation hunts and general hunting opportunities, capped at 300 elk per year;

- a prohibition on feeding elk, except by DFW; and
- the use of managed livestock grazing to draw elk away from roads and private property.

By October 31, 2020, DFW and DOT must submit a report to the Legislature on the results of the pilot program. The pilot program expires July 1, 2021.
