- Eliminates option of juvenile detention for contempt of an At-Risk Youth or dependency order effective July 1, 2019.
- Requires status offenders in detention to be separated from juveniles detained pursuant to criminal law violations until July 1, 2019.

SENATE COMMITTEE ON HUMAN SERVICES, MENTAL HEALTH & HOUSING

Staff: Kevin Black (786-7747)

Background: The Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1974 (JJDP) provides federal funding to local jurisdictions to support juvenile justice activities, provided that they comply with certain core requirements. One such requirement is the deinstitutionalization of status offenders. A status offender is a juvenile who is incarcerated for actions that would not be considered offenses if done by an adult. Common status offenses nationally include skipping school, running away, breaking curfew, defying parental instructions, and possession or use of alcohol or tobacco.

This analysis was prepared by non-partisan legislative staff for the use of legislative members in their deliberations. This analysis is not a part of the legislation nor does it constitute a statement of legislative intent.

A 1984 amendment to the JJDPA provides for an exception to the deinstitutionalization of status offenders requirement, which is known as the Valid Court Order (VCO) exception. The VCO exception allows judges to place youth adjudicated for status offenses in secure detention when the youth has disobeyed an order of the court to take an action, such as to attend school. Washington law permits courts to order secure detention for juveniles pursuant to the VCO exception in instances detailed below.

When members of a family are experiencing conflict, the parent of a child may file an At-Risk Youth (ARY) petition under certain circumstances. An ARY is a juvenile who is absent from home for at least 72 hours without parental consent, who is beyond the control of the parent such that the juvenile's behavior endangers the health, safety, and welfare of the juvenile or another person, or who has a substance use disorder for which there are no pending criminal charges. If a court grants an ARY petition, the court may order the juvenile to reside at home with the parent or to reside in an agreed out-of-home placement. The court may set further conditions of supervision including but not limited to regular school attendance, counseling, participation in substance use disorder or mental health treatment, or employment. The court may also place requirements on parents. If a juvenile fails to abide by the requirements of an ARY order, the court may find the juvenile in contempt and place the juvenile in remedial detention for up to seven days, impose up to a $100 fine, or both.

Washington's dependency laws allow the court to issue a placement order placing a child in out-of-home care following a shelter care or fact-finding hearing alleging that the juvenile is a dependent child. A dependent child is a child who has been abandoned, abused or neglected by a person legally responsible for their care, or who has no parent or guardian capable of adequately caring for them in circumstances which cause danger of substantial damage to a child's development. A court may issue an order directing law enforcement to take a child into custody based on probable cause to believe that the child has violated a placement order.

Washington's truancy laws require schools to take a range of actions to reduce a student's unexcused absences from school. Among these obligations is filing of a truancy petition in juvenile court when a student has amassed seven unexcused absences within a month or ten unexcused absences within a school year. Truancy petitions must be stayed upon filing and referred to a community truancy board (CTB) in school districts with over 250 students. If CTB intervention fails to ameliorate the student's unexcused absences, the case must be returned to juvenile court for a hearing. If the court finds that the student has unexcused absences, that actions taken by the school district have not been successful in reducing the absences, and that court intervention is necessary, the court may issue an order requiring the child to attend school and to fulfill other requirements, such as undergoing an assessment for mental health or substance use disorder treatment needs. If the child fails to comply with this court order, the court may commit the child to remedial detention for up to seven days or impose alternatives to detention, such as community restitution.

Summary of Bill: It is the policy of the state to entirely phase out the use of juvenile detention as a remedy for contempt of a VCO by July 1, 2019. No youth may be placed in detention as a contempt sanction or based on a warrant pursuant to laws related to ARY, truancy, or dependency after July 1, 2019.

Until July 1, 2019, any youth committed to juvenile detention under chapters relating to ARY, truancy, and dependency laws must be detained in such a manner so that no direct communication or physical contact may be made between the youth and any youth who is detained pursuant to a violation of criminal law.

Legal provisions authorizing detention for contempt of a truancy order are eliminated effective July 1, 2018. Legal provisions authorizing detention related to ARY and dependency are eliminated effective July 1, 2019.

Staff Summary of Public Testimony: PRO: Last year, we amended truancy laws to require exhaustive efforts to discover the root cause why a child is not in school. This will be transformative in creating a more compassionate model where school districts identify what services families need and refer them to those services. The CTB model will be fully implemented by the 2018 school year. This bill phases in the elimination of detention to occur afterwards. Most states do not use the VCO exception. Of those that do, most use it less than 100 times a year. Washington is far outside the norm, recently using it 2700 times in one year, which was 30 percent of the nation's usage. Half of these cases were in Grays Harbor County. Detention has negative consequences for youth. Potential for graduation plummets. Many of these kids are dually involved in the foster care system; their chance of graduating is 14 percent. Detention is for criminally involved youth, and has a level of fear attached to it. When youth are exposed to this environment, they are desensitized and are at higher risk to commit crimes. Detention can worsen mental health problems and causes strain on families and relationships. Community-based services are more effective. Please include young people at the table as you work through this. Detention cannot save kids who struggle with abuse and trauma. We all want to keep kids safe. By locking them up, we send a message that they are criminals, not children in crisis. Where does it stop? If I saw it work even once, I would support it. Children in this position should be found to meet criteria for involuntary treatment, instead of being treated like lawbreakers. We need to provide more services to support court efforts.

CON: This relates to at-risk youth, not just truancy. Kids are not placed in detention lightly. In dependency cases, we authorize bench warrants for runaway kids and hold them so that the social worker can meet with them and figure out the root problem. They don't stay more than 24 hours. We don't have any involuntary beds available outside detention facilities. We need to have all the tools in our toolbox. Grays Harbor County and formerly Okanogan County are the outliers. This is a life and death issue in some circumstances. Courts need to intercede and get kids off the streets into a safe place overnight.
